I love you a bunch

Do you ever wonder who puts the stickers on your bananas? It's people like Monica, that's who! Monica works on a banana farm in Colombia, South America, where it's her job to put the Fair Trade stickers on your bananas. Fair Trade helps Monica and her fellow workers get extra money they need for food, education, and doctor visits.

You're one in a melon

Many kids around the world can't afford to buy school supplies like backpacks, notebooks, and pencils. The Fair Trade seal on your food helps families pay for these things so their children can go to school and receive an education. In other words, your lunch is making the world a better place!

Have a berry good day

How would you feel if you didn't get a lunch break? Some workers around the world who grow our food aren't guaranteed the time to stop and rest during the day. The Fair Trade seal on your berries, bananas, tomatoes, and other produce means the farmer who grew it received paid breaks to stretch, eat, and rest during the day.
